Summary

- Around 6 p.m., reports leaked out that the deal was struck in the US, extending the raised debt ceiling until February and reopening US government; the news sparked a rally on American stock markets.
- The budget conference committee, consisting of Democrat and Republican politicians of Congress, has until 13 December to come up with a programme, but the two political parties are deeply divided over the method of fiscal adjustment.
- Goldman Sachs is to publish its quarterly earnings report today.

Around 6 p.m. (CET) on Wednesday, reports leaked out that the Republicans and Democrats had reached agreement about reopening the federal government offices and raising the debt ceiling. Since then, President Obama has signed the agreement. US federal officials will resume work today.

These reports sent American markets 1-1.4% higher, preserving their gains until the end of session.

It is important to point out about the new debt ceiling that this solution expires in February. Thus, the disagreements causing a rift between Democrats and Republicans will resurface at the beginning of 2014. This time President Obama successfully averted Republicans' offensive, the objective of which was to make the President rescind the financing of (part of) his healthcare programme dubbed 'Obamacare'.

The deficit cutting committee, set up with the participation of Democrat and Republican politicians of Congress has until 13 December to come up with a programme, but the two political parties are deeply divided over the method of fiscal adjustment (Republicans would prefer robust cost cuts, while Democrats support an increase in redistribution).

Europe's stock markets opened with modest losses – investors seem to be taking profits, following the agreement in the USA.

Goldman Sachs will publish its Q3 report today.
