Summary

- Stock markets stagnated in Europe and achieved small gains in the USA. This morning's publication of China's PMI missed forecasts, and caused losses to Asia's stock markets.
- This morning, Germany published better-than-expected PMI, offering some hope that the German economy may grow by 1.7% of GDP in line with the market consensus.
- European purchasing managers' indices were also higher than predicted.

While Europe stagnated on Wednesday, the riskier securities in the USA could make gains. HSBC's purchasing managers' index for China, released in the small hours of Thursday, unexpectedly fell to its lowest in six months. Accordingly, the investment mood soured in Asia: the Hang Seng (-1.4%) and the Nikkei (-0.8%) were both seen in the red at 9:30 (CET) this morning.

The purchasing managers' indices published in Europe came in better than expected. Germany's PMI came in at 56.3, the best reading since May 2011. A string of data released on Tuesday indicated that industrial orders had surged, and the data in today's survey confirm this. Following last year's 0.4% growth, there is some hope that Germany may grow by 1.7% in line with analysts' expectations.
