Summary

- Monday's trading was rather gloomy on global markets.
- Europe's stock indices slipped; so did US indices, ending a zigzag day.
- Government bond yields are on the rise in Europe, but dropped in the USA on the back of the weak New York manufacturing data.

The week started pessimistically in Western Europe's equity markets, with indices falling throughout Europe. The Stoxx600 closed 0.7% down, as all of its sector indices sank. The retail sector, oil and gas producers, media companies and travel service names were hit the hardest; financial service providers and the property sector also underperformed. In Europe, London's FTSE (-0.9%) and the Swiss stock index (-1.1%) fell the sharpest, while Milan's stock index climbed 0.2% higher, largely owing to the growth of Italian banking shares following the announcement of the merger of Banco Popolare and Banca Popolare di Milano. The FTSE was dragged down by oil companies (Royal Dutch Shell fell 1.7%, and BP lost 1.2%); but the loser of the day was Pearson, the publishing company, which nosedived 8.4% on the back of shrinking revenues in its Q3 earnings report.

Amid the intensifying interest rate hike expectations, stock indices could not gain impetus in the USA: the Dow, the S&P and the NASDAQ100 all went 0.3% down. Within the S&P's sector indices, consumer discretionaries was the weakest sector; financial service providers, the energy sector, health care and consumer staples all underperformed. Oil producers were hit by the sinking crude price, as the WTI crude slipped 0.9%, below USD 50, and the Brent dropped 0.8% in Monday's trading. Even the better-than-expected earnings reports of Bank of America and Charles Schwab could not help financial service providers. In after-hours trading, IBM fell 2.7% even though its quarterly earnings figures topped market expectations. The winner in after-hours trading was Netflix, whose stock price rallied 20% as its operating profit beat forecasts and the number of subscribers jumped in Q3 faster than thought. Intel, Johnson & Johnson, and Yahoo! are to publish their earnings figures today.

Japan opened Tuesday's trading with gains, while mainland China and Hong Kong started with losses. The relatively more supportive sentiment in Asia may have stemmed from the easing rate hike expectations, following a release of poor US manufacturing data.

The USD's weakening led the EUR/USD 0.3% higher, above 1.10, and it raised the USD/JPY closer to 104. The GBP/USD did not change meaningfully on Monday.

Bond yields increased in Europe, owing to the intensifying anticipations of a rate hike, but they went down in America as the New York Fed manufacturing index deteriorated further, as opposed to the expected growth. Monday's speech of Fed vice chair Stanley Fischer Fed lacked direct indication as to the timing of US rate hike, but he thinks the Fed is on the point of fulfilling its duty in the fields of full employment and stable price levels.

As expected, America's September industrial output slightly increased from the previous month.

Statistics on China's loan portfolio are due out today.

Later in the day, inflation data will see the light of day in the United Kingdom and the USA.
