Summary

- Fears about the elected US president are easing; Donald Trump's promises regarding infrastructural development drove the Dow Jones industrial average to record high yesterday.
- The USD made slight gains against the EUR, the drop in crude oil prices stopped, and the MXN extended its losses.
- Today's publications include the University of Michigan's November consumer sentiment index, which analysts expect to have edged higher.

The benign sentiment on America's stock markets persevered; the Dow Jones hit an all-time high, but the pressure on the tech sector dragged the NASDAQ 0.8% down. Europe missed a single direction in early trading, and despite the optimistic US investors, Asia's indices moved mixed this morning.

While the fears about the newly elected president are easing (Reuters reports that a number of controversial items have disappeared from his campaign site), the promises that comprehensive infrastructural developments may follow have increased demand for industrial producer and industrial raw material companies' shares. Copper futures hit a 16-month high in London; nickel and aluminium prices have also upped.

The EUR/USD erased the morning's swings on Wednesday, and the modest dollar appreciation continued on Thursday. Today the pair was seen trading near 1.09. The Mexican peso could not correct; it seems to continue its losing streak. The USD/MXN has hit 20.6, up from Wednesday morning's 18.2.

The drop in crude oil prices seems to have halted; the Brent stabilized above USD 45.
