Global Daily Report

Summary

- The key stock markets were optimistic in Western Europe and barely moved in America.
- Donald Trump has presented his first budget outline.
- The GBP and the TRY firmed notably yesterday.
- Precious and industrial metal future prices increased, crude fell to November's level.

The benign sentiment in Thursday's trading on Western Europe's equity markets stemmed from the Fed's interest rate hike on the previous day and from the outcome of the Dutch elections. The leading indices in Europe closed with near-0.6% gains, while their American peers posted slight losses. On both sides of the Atlantic, 10Y bond yields inched up. Asia's equity markets ended this morning's trading in the red; the Shanghai Composite's 1% loss marked the sharpest fall.

Donald Trump submitted to Congress the budget blueprint for the fiscal year starting in October 2017, with plans to boost spending on defence and national security, as promised earlier, while curbing social and environmental expenditure, and cutting funds allocated for the State Department. Following the announcement, utilities (-1.2%) and health care sector stocks (-1%) headed the plunge within the S&P sector indices. Health care names fell because the new budget plan would substantially cut funding for the National Institutes of Health, the largest medical research institute in the USA.

Thursday's meeting of the Bank of England left its base rate and its quantitative program in place, as expected – yet the pound appreciated nearly 1% against the USD and the EUR as one MPC member unexpectedly voted to raise interest rates, arguing that the GBP's weakening is accelerating inflation. Following Wednesday's rally, the euro continued its winning streak against the greenback, driving the EUR/USD to 1.08. The Turkish central bank's monetary tightening gave impetus to the TRY, invigorating the CEE region's currencies as well.

The Brent (51.7 USD/barrel) and the WTI (USD 48.8) fell to November's level yesterday. Precious metal futures prices rose by more than 2%. Industrial metal prices rose slower, with tin seeing the strongest gain (+1.1%).

The US industrial production statistics and the University of Michigan consumer sentiment index are worth keeping an eye on today.
