Global Daily Report

Summary

- European stock markets' advance halted but US benchmarks broke new records
- Apple fell 2.5% as some functions of its 3G watch are unlikely to function in China
- Oil prices fell; the EUR gained ground from the USD and the GBP

Europe's stock markets headed down, probably also because the Madrid government's ultimatum to Catalan leaders to clarify their position ended at 10:00 on Thursday. In the lack of any specific action, investors opted to take profits. In contrast, the US Dow Jones Industrial Average and the S&P 500 both closed at new highs, even if the momentum lost some steam. Of the Dow components, the winner of the day was General Electric (+2.3%). At the other end of the scale, Apple's share price shrank 2.5% owing to news that Chinese authorities are to block the newly marketed next-generation Apple watch's call and message initiation functions, and the IT giant failed to inform customers about this development.

The EUR firmed versus the US dollar and the GBP. Crude prices slipped more than 1% on Thursday.

This morning Asia was heading higher, and the USD was seen appreciating against the EUR.

The United Kingdom's retail sales surprised on the downside, as did America's leading indicators index: the former sank 0.8% and the latter dipped 0.2% in September. Today's macroeconomic calendar is far from being packed. The afternoon's release of US existing home sales in September is worth keeping an eye on. The Fed's chair Janet Yellen will make a speech in Washington, in the small hours of Saturday (CET).
