Global Daily Report

Summary

- US markets fell sharply on Friday, and Western Europe also closed down
- The stronger-than-expected US wage growth data triggered a rise in America's long-term yields

The Dow Jones Industrial Average suffered its sixth sharpest intraday fall on record (by value) on Friday, when a 600-point slide took all of its 30 components in the red. On each day last week, the S&P500 closed lower than it had opened. The VIX index, an indicator of market volatility, jumped 27%, its highest rate in 18 months. One reason that soured the sentiment was the stronger-than-expected US labour market figure for January, which sent long-term yields higher. Another was one a document, published by Republicans, on the FBI's alleged support of Democrats during the presidential election campaign.

Despite a slight dollar firming, the EUR/USD remained above 1.24. Crude oil prices edged down. On Friday Janet Yellen stepped down – the Fed's first female chair will work in the Brookings Institute in Washington, where Ben Bernanke works. Her successor, Jerome Powell is likely to be sworn in today.

Western Europe's key stock markets all closed in the red too.

US non-farm payroll grew by 200,000 in January, beating the forecast of 181,000. What is more interesting is that the month/month wage dynamic also overshot polls, and the previous month's figure was also revised up. This has accelerated wages' annual growth to 2.9%, its highest since 2009. This release caused an increase in long-term yields, even though the San Francisco Fed chair tried to dampen expectations that tighter monetary policy may follow.

In today's publications, the eurozone will release retail sales statistics and the Sentix index. The ISM non-manufacturing PMI is due out in the USA.
