

Summary

- Global stock markets maintained their growth on Monday; the S&P hit new high. Long-term bond yields fell.
- The upside surprise in China's monthly economic data gave rise to optimism on equity markets.
- The CEE region's indices picked up.

Stock markets started the week with slight gains on both sides of the Atlantic. Monday morning's release of better-than-expected industrial production and retail statistics in China kick-started growth in Europe, and stock markets maintained momentum even though China's GDP statistics signified deceleration in the second quarter, as expected. The 6.2% year/year growth marks the weakest performance in the past 27 years. Europe's indices were driven higher mostly by the sectors that are susceptible to trade war fears; thus the winners of the day came from the auto industry, the chemical industry, and the base materials sector. In the morning, the DAX made a brief visit to sub-zero territories shortly after Germany's economy ministry warned of signs of weakening in the manufacturing and services sectors, which may lead to paler Q2 growth data. Europe's chip makers also shifted into higher gear after US officials said that America might nod on re-launching deals with Huawei in two weeks. The share prices of Infineon and STMicroelectronics advanced 2.4% and 0.6% respectively. The earnings reports season kicked off in Europe; Telenor and ASML are to release their figures on Tuesday and Wednesday, respectively.

Ending a day of ebbs and flows, America's stock indices closed with small gains, largely supported by the tech sector. The Dow inched up 0.1%, the S&P practically did not budge, while the Nasdaq100 crept 0.3% higher. The rise in technology, utilities, and cyclical consumer goods offset the losses of the energy sector and financial service providers. Citigroup's quarterly report revealed stronger-than-expected profit but smaller margins, dragging down other banking shares as well. Citigroup lost less than 0.1%, but JPMorgan dropped 1.2%, Wells Fargo slid 1.4%, and Bank of America fell 0.8%. BlackRock, Goldman Sachs, JPMorgan, Johnson&Johnson, Morgan Stanley, Netflix, and Wells Fargo will all release their quarterly figures today. The Q2 reporting season is expected to be the weakest one in many years; analysts polled by Bloomberg forecast lower profits.

The US 10Y Treasury Note yield sank three basis points, to less than 2.1%. Yields also dropped in Europe: those on German and British bonds were down four basis points each, the French one dipped five points, the Spanish and Italian 10Y government bond yields fell six and nine basis points, respectively. The US dollar slightly appreciated; the Bloomberg Dollar Spot Index inched up 0.1%, while the EUR/USD edged 0.1% lower, to 1.1257. The GBP/USD's decline to 1.2514 is consistent with 0.5% dollar appreciation.

The CEE region's stock indices slightly firmed on Monday, with Poland's WIG20 climbing 0.4% higher, Hungary's BUX and Czechia's PX adding 0.1% each.

In commodities, Brent declined 0.4%, while WTI fell 1.0%. In precious metals, gold increased by 0.3% and silver grew by 1.1%.

Asia's markets closed mixed this morning: Japan and mainland China stood in the red, while the benchmarks of Hong Kong, South Korea and India were seen in positive territory. American and European barely moved this morning.

Germany's ZEW indicator may be worth checking today. The USA is to publish retail sales, industrial production, and business inventory statistics today – they may be particularly exciting as they tell us more about the health of the US economy, and thus might affect interest rate expectations.
