Summary

- The technology sector continued its march higher.
- US inflation accelerated to six-year high.
- The Fed's rate-setting meeting will end today.

The string of rate decisions due later this week left its mark on Tuesday's session, prompting investors to adopt a wait-and-see approach. Today's meeting of the Fed central bankers will be followed by those of the ECB on Thursday, and the Bank of Japan on Friday. Failing to pare the morning's losses by the close, Western Europe's key indices ended in the red. America's markets could pick up and close in positive territory at the end of the day, except for the Dow. The technology sector's surge drove the NASDAQ100 0.6% higher, one of its best-performing components, Tesla advanced 3.2% as Elon Musk confirmed on Twitter that the company was planning a 9% job cut.

Richard Leon, a federal judge in Washington DC, overruled the verdict of the US Department of Justice's antitrust office, opening the door to the AT&T telecommunications company acquiring Time Warner.

The EUR and the JPY dropped 0.3% versus the US dollar. But the euro preserved its strength against emerging currencies. The Turkish lira (TRY) depreciated more than 1% against the key currencies.

Brent futures slipped more than 1%. The most important industrial and precious metal prices edged lower.

Asia's stock markets ended a gloomy trading this morning. Among the most important indices, Japan's Nikkei225 could advance. The yen opened with loss against the USD.

US inflation accelerated to 2.8% year/year in May, its highest reading since 2012. The rise in fuel prices left its mark on consumer prices; core inflation accelerated from 2.1% to 2.2%. This bolstered expectations that the Fed Open Market Committee will raise interest rates by 25 basis points today. According to the Wall Street Journal's sources, from now on each meeting, rather than every second one, will be followed by a press conference.
